Introduction to Political Sociology (159779)

Bart Bonikowski

2016 Fall (4 Credits)

Schedule: TR 1100 AM - 1159 AM

Instructor Permissions: None

Enrollment Cap: 60

Politics is about power and authority. But the production, conservation and distribution of power and authority occur far beyond Capitol Hill: in family dynamics, neighborhood residential patterns, racial discrimination, welfare policies, social movements, nation-states and the globalized economy. So how is power exerted? Where is it, and how is it gained and lost? How do power centers get challenged? In this course, we examine such questions using the conceptual framework and analytic tools of political sociology. Major themes will include the nation-state and its challengers, capitalism, democracy, and globalization. Abstract, theoretical works are explored with practical applications and illustrations in specific national/historical contexts. Students will also become aware of criticisms and debates in political sociology –as well as its limitations.

Introduction to Social Inequality (117584)

Jason Beckfield

2017 Spring (4 Credits)

Schedule:

TR 0100 PM - 0159 PM

Instructor Permissions: Instructor

Enrollment Cap: n/a

At its core, the study of social inequality seeks to answer two simple questions: who gets what, and why? This course will begin with a descriptive assessment of how socioeconomic resources are distributed by social class, race, and gender. We will then explore the social processes, structures, and institutions that influence the distribution of these resources. Course materials will combine cutting edge data with a selection of books that have defined contemporary research on social inequality.

2017 Spring (4 Credits)

Schedule:

TBD

Instructor Permissions: None

Enrollment Cap: n/a

This course examines the evolution of the modern organization, focusing on changing approaches to corporate strategy and to managing employees. We read both social scientific analyses and Harvard Business School cases to trace the history of management, from the harsh principles of the "drive system" to the latest theories of how "work teams" improve productivity and how focusing on a firm's "core competence" improves the bottom line. The course covers research examining the efficiency and the equity of current corporate practice

Introduction to Social Movements (109656)

Jocelyn Viterna

2016 Fall (4 Credits)

Schedule:

TR 1100 AM - 1159 AM

Enrollment Cap: n/a

Social movements and revolution have long been driving forces behind political, social, and cultural change. From the Civil Rights movement of the 60s to the recent and unpredicted "Arab Spring," the extraordinary mobilization of ordinary people is routinely credited with fundamentally re-shaping societal institutions--the polity, the economy, religion, gender, race, and even the environment. But can we really define and study something as ephemeral as social mobilization? Do we know how social movements begin? Why might they become revolutionary? Can they make a difference in the societies they target? This course examines these questions within the sociological literature on collective action. Theories of social movements and revolutions are then applied to a series of case studies around the globe. Case studies may include the US, Iran, China, El Salvador, Chile, India, Poland, Argentina, Egypt, and Nigeria, among others. Students will also be required to apply course readings to the collective action case of their choosing throughout the semester.

Schedule: TBDInstructor Permissions: InstructorEnrollment Cap: 30

Students gain research skills along with an understanding of the production of sociological knowledge through work on faculty research projects. Work is arranged and directed by faculty members, who supervise and meet with students regularly (every 1-2 weeks). The specifics of the intellectual goals for the student and the research tasks involved will vary. The student and faculty member will consult on this in advance and will outline the following on the 92r Registration Form: 1) the specific skills to be learned, 2) how the course will engage students with the discipline, and 3) the specific work product. What students produce will depend on the kind of research involved. It is expected that students will work 8 to 10 hours per week on the course. Students may engage with data collection, data analysis, literature reviews, or other aspects of a faculty project.

Protest and the State (159924)

Danilo Mandic

2016 Fall (4 Credits)

Schedule: M 0400 AM - 0559 AM

Instructor Permissions: Instructor Enrollment Cap: 10

Social movement protests challenging state policy, legitimacy and leadership have become a central feature of American political life. This tutorial explores major protest episodes in the United States, emphasizing historical trajectories and movement precedents. Four major trajectories will be considered: (1) the Civil Rights Movements of the 1950s and 1960s, and Black Lives Matter activism; (2) 1960s student movements and 2000s antiwar activism; (3) early 20th century US labor movements, and anti-globalization and Occupy Wall Street activism; and (4) suffragist and early feminist movements, and the women's movement of the 1960s and 1970s and contemporary LGBTQ activism. Students will conduct an independent research project on a movement of their choosing (not necessarily one covered in the syllabus) using the conceptual and methodological tools of sociology –archival research, content analysis, interviews, and/or ethnography. In addition to learning about issues of protest and the state, the tutorial will be dedicated to exploring issues in research design and methods. Several weeks will be devoted to student presentations and workshoping, as students develop an independent research project with original data collection.

Enrollment Cap: 10

Privilege is an understudied but important topic in educational and social science research. Recent scholarship increasingly attends to the role that elite educational institutions play in producing and maintaining social and economic inequalities. In this course, we will investigate the connections between class, privilege, and educational advantage. By employing the lens of cultural sociology, we will explore various contexts for elite education, the cultural practices around which they are organized, and the ways in which individuals negotiate a sense of legitimacy and identity within these spaces.

Instructor Permissions: None

Enrollment Cap:

What is community? Where does it come from, and what does it accomplish? To engage these questions, we will explore community from three distinct but complimentary perspectives: ethnography, intention, and policy. We begin with classic accounts of urban and suburban communities, and more recent work on communities struggling through changes like gentrification or environmental disasters. From there we turn to communities formed through intention: cults, communes, workplace cultures, social movements, and virtual networks. Finally, we consider how community enters the policy and planning domain, through community policing and new urbanist planning principles. Students will have opportunities to reflect on their own ideas about community via analytical response papers and an original piece of research exploring a community of their own choosing.

This course explores war, revolution and organized crime as interrelated social phenomena. Students will read sociologists, historians, political scientists and philosophers addressing the nature, causes and consequences of these phenomena in different national and historical contexts. The course will combine influential theoretical frameworks (by Karl Marx, Max Weber, Sigmund Freud, Hannah Arendt), middle-range social scientific approaches (by Anthony Giddens, Charles Tilly, Michael Mann, Theda Skocpol), and empirical and historical analyses (by Eric Hobsbawm, Benedict Anderson, James C. Scott, Eugen Weber). The three phenomena will further be scrutinized through their (mis)representation in movies by Mike Nichols, Milos Forman, Bernardo Bertolucci and others.

In this course, we will use culture as an analytic lens for investigating the institution and experience of school. We will examine 1) relationships and borders between schooling and broader educational contexts including families and communities; 2) schools as dynamic social and cultural systems, and 3) classrooms as sites of conflict, collaboration, and innovation in teaching and learning. Throughout, we will consider how individuals in a variety of roles –teachers, students, administrators, parents, researchers –interpret, negotiate, and respond to the practices and arrangements of schooling. We will examine the complex role of cultural factors in producing, maintaining, and potentially reducing inequalities in educational access, opportunity, and outcomes.

This course asks how gender, sexuality, race, dis/ability, class, and other intersections of identity impact how we use and appear on social media. Early internet theorists imagined the World Wide Web as a "free" society, where "bodily" issues such as race, gender, and disability would somehow disappear. However, these identities have not vanished; in fact, we might argue that they remain even more potent in today's age of constant media connection. We will explore sociological and feminist theories of media, gender, sexuality, and race, as well as applying these theories to current events online. Students will explore the boundaries of digital activism, question the ways we continue to be embodied online, and consider power relations, discipline, and surveillance.

In this course, we will study health differences between social groups. We will begin by examining the extent to which health is unevenly distributed across groups defined by nationality, neighborhood, race, gender, and class. We will then seek to pinpoint the reasons for these disparities with a detailed analysis of the pathways through which these factors are linked to health status. Finally, we will discuss new research on the sociology of population health that shows how health disparities depend on meso- and macro-scale causes like neighborhoods, social policy arrangements, global organizations, and climate change.

Immigration is one of the most powerful forces in influencing the structure of societies, altering everything from educational and economic institutions to politics. Understanding the immigration process from a sociological perspective provides insight into why individuals and groups move, how they are received and incorporated into the host society, and the implications for the native-born and for those who stay behind. These theoretical issues will be explored through an examination of actual migration flows over time and around the world. Although the focus of the course will be on U.S. immigration, we will also spend some time on non-U.S. flows, including the current refugee crisis in Europe.

This course explores the tensions, contradictions, and mutual appropriations that characterize the relationship between law, science, and technology in America. It examines how ideas of evidence, expertise, and public reason have changed over the past half-century in response to such phenomena as the rise of the risk society, environmentalism, patient advocacy, and the information revolution. Law is broadly construed to include the activities of legislatures, regulatory agencies, and courts. The course seeks to contextualize the interactions of law, science, and technology in relation to wider transformations in US culture and society.

Social Change in Modern Korea (109680)

2017 Spring (4 Credits)

Schedule: TR 1000 AM - 1129 AM

Instructor Permissions: None

Enrollment Cap: n/a

This course explores the incredible transformation of Korean society in the modern period. We begin with the demise of the Chosŏn Dynasty at the end of the 19th century before covering the Japanese colonial period (1910-1945), the emergence of two Korean nation-states (1945-1948), the Korean War (1950-53), and the contemporary period (1960-present). The course is divided into two distinct parts. In the first part of the course we discuss Korea's political and economic transformation and in the second, we cover social and cultural change. Upon completion of the course, students should have a thorough grasp of the vast social changes Korea underwent in the 20th century.

Social movements are an important part of both democratic and non-democratic societies. This course assesses the state of civil society in East Asia by surveying contemporary social movements in China, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Japan, and South Korea. We start the course by discussing the main concepts and analytic approaches in social movement theory. We then apply these theoretical frameworks to specific mobilization efforts in East Asia, keeping in mind each country's unique historical context. With the theoretical and empirical tools gleaned from the lectures and readings, students will pursue a case analysis of an East Asian social movement of their choosing.

Descriptive and inferential techniques used in quantitative sociological research. Emphasis is on the fundamentals of the linear regression model for continuous response variables, focusing on assumptions and interpretation. Motivation, application, and presentation are stressed; topics include categorical covariates, interactions, and diagnostics. Because the linear regression model is the foundation for more specialized models that are often applied in sociological research, the aim of this course is to develop the skills necessary to (a) understand quantitative sociological research, (b) produce convincing analysis, (c) evaluate quantitative analysis, and (d) learn more specialized techniques as needed.

This multidisciplinary seminar will read and discuss research on crime, the social context in which it occurs, and criminal justice policy. We address this literature in the historic context of shifts in US crime policy to a less punitive regime, where incarceration rates may be significantly reduced. Besides studying empirical research on crime and punishment, we will also consider the future of crime policy, and how principles of justice can guide the role of police and corrections in poor communities.

This course is intended to enhance the teaching skills of graduate students in the Sociology Department. Through a combination of classroom discussions and teaching simulations, the seminar challenges students to discover and hone their teaching styles, to develop a personal philosophy about teaching and learning, to develop self-confidence leading and facilitating small and large group discussions, to learn about the teaching resources that are available to them throughout the university, to experiment with designing engaging courses of study, and to discover that teaching can be a rewarding and stimulating element of an academic career.

Course Notes:

Required of and limited to graduate students in Sociology. Attendance at first meeting is required. Not repeatable for credit.

The graduate workshop on mixed methods is a forum for graduate students and faculty to present their empirical work-qualitative, quantitative, or mixed-methods-and get feedback on the empirical veracity of their claims. Individuals of all methodological persuasions are welcome. We are particularly interested in exploring synergies that can occur across methodological boundaries, either in the context of mixed-methods projects or in the context of collaboration between qualitative and quantitative researchers.

Course Notes: First meeting will be January 29th.
